

Help Wanted!

Starting a revolution in Jewish Community Health

Get a Master's in Public Health and Do Health Promotion in the Jewish Community

Introducing the Jewish Community Health Fellowship

Join the fight against obesity and chronic disease and help Jews lead healthier lives!

Every community needs health promotion to change attitudes and lifestyles. To be effective, this requires professionally trained individuals with knowledge and experience specific to that community.

For the Jewish community, where will these professionals come from?

The MPH program at Case Western Reserve University and its Jewish Community Health Initiative (JChi), has created the Jewish Community Health Fellowship program to meet this need.

- Master's Degree in Public Health (M.P.H.)
- Major in Health Promotion/Disease Prevention
- Specialized coursework on doing public and community health in the Jewish community
- Graduate assistantship with the Jewish Community Health Initiative working on projects in the Jewish community and schools.
- Train and do community screenings.
- Do health outreach and program development.
- Field placement and MPH Capstone project at community partner.

For more information please visit www.casemph.org or www.JewHealth.org.
 You may reach Dr. Mendel Singer, Fellowship Director at JChi@case.edu or 216.368.1951.
 Applications accepted through June 30, 2012 with review of applications beginning May 1, 2012